Teaching Philosophy

I view art education as a space for inquiry, experimentation, and critical reflection. My teaching combines material exploration with conceptual development, encouraging students to connect their work to broader cultural, social, and personal contexts. I strive to create inclusive studio environments where students feel safe to take creative risks, develop their voice, and engage in meaningful dialogue.

About teaching

Hello, I'm Vera Rincón Korman. I was born in Colombia to a multicultural family — my father is Colombian, and my mother is also Colombian with roots in the Polish-Jewish community. As a child, we moved frequently — first to Brazil, later to Israel, and for a period to Denmark. I grew up navigating between cultures, languages, and identities. That experience shaped a lifelong interest in how people construct meaning — socially, politically, and personally.

I've been committed to the visual arts since I was 15, when I began studying at an art high school. As a teenager, I struggled to fit into traditional structures and eventually left high school — but with a very clear goal: to pursue higher education. I've always been extremely curious, intellectually driven, and passionate about learning. That independence deepened my interest in history, literature, and social theory — subjects that gave me context, perspective, and direction. They continue to shape the way I teach today.

I completed my high school diploma externally and went on to earn a Bachelor of Arts, alongside courses in Women's Studies and Gender Theory. I later earned an MFA in Art and New Media from the Sandberg Institute in Amsterdam, graduating with honors. My thesis — written in English — explored identity and the body in contemporary art, blending theory, cultural history, and personal narrative.

After completing my studies, I lived and worked in Turkey before returning to Israel, where I taught in art colleges, universities, and eventually in public and alternative high schools. For over a decade, I've taught at Alon High School for Arts and Science — one of Israel's leading high schools — and at Musrara, a school for socially engaged art and new media in Jerusalem. I also curated six editions of the Musraramix International Art Festival, integrating education, community engagement, and artistic practice.

Over time, my passion for learning evolved into a passion for teaching. I see teaching not just as delivering knowledge, but as asking meaningful questions, co-creating understanding, and supporting critical, creative thinking. My approach is interdisciplinary, project-based, and always student-centered.
